“Current Trends in Human Rights Law”

15-25 August 2013 –İstanbul -Turkey

organized by

Istanbul University Faculty of Law

in association with

Leiden University, Leiden Law School and

The Raoul Wallenberg Institute

OBJECTIVE:

In a globalizing legal order, Human Rights Law has secured a strong foothold as a common binding framework. As the increasing complexities of Law and Society place greater qualitative and quantitative demands on the functioning of legal orders, common ground in such a framework is not only welcome but also necessary. Indeed, with its broad interface with other fields of law and aspects of society, Human Rights Law is structurally deployed not only autonomously but also as an ordering system in many other fields of law. This occurs on many levels: nationally, internationally, supranationally and transnationally. Essential as it has become however, at the same time, as it rapidly evolves, Human Rights Law itself becomes all the more complex. On the one hand, ‘Human Rights Law’ does not exist as one coherent closed system. Rather, various national and non-national variants operate at the same time, without an institutional hierarchical structure. Both substantively and from an organic and procedural perspective, Human Rights Law is this decidedly pluralistic. On the other hand, as it develops, Human Rights Law is continually expanding, often in the hands of authoritative supranational Courts such as the European Court of Human Rights, who choose an extensive approach to not only Human Rights Law ‘content’ but also its ‘relationship’ with other types and levels of law.

Keeping a grip on contemporary Human Rights Law is thus not an easy task. The objective of the ‘Current Trends in Human Rights Law’ Summer School is to bring participants ‘on-trend’ with regards to state-of-the-art developments in Human Rights Law. Featuring experts from distinct parts of Europe and the world, the Summer School will be oriented on the most important current distinguishing features and terrains of Human Rights Law.
