The objective was the development of a national taxonomy for the purposes of an international convention on marine resources. This convention would be used by the U.S. to make specific, non-mandatory, and non-opaque recommendations for the protection of marine resources. These recommendations would be based on the scientific knowledge available and would be designed to ensure the sustainable use of marine resources.

The convention was established to address the lack of international cooperation in managing marine resources. The convention would provide a framework for countries to work together to address the challenges of managing marine resources, including the protection of marine habitats and the conservation of marine species. The convention would also provide a mechanism for countries to report on their progress in implementing the recommendations of the convention.

The convention was not a substitute for national action, but rather a tool to encourage and facilitate international cooperation.
